Dear Mr. Secretary,

We write to you with urgency about the case of Rhoda Ya'u Jatau, a Nigerian citizen in Bauchi State who has been imprisoned for over six months on charges of blasphemy.

Jatau, 45, was arrested by agents of Nigeria's Department of State Services on May 20, after she shared a WhatsApp video criticizing the murder of Deborah Yakubu, a Nigerian Christian university student who was herself the victim of blasphemy accusations. She is currently awaiting trial.

On the day she was arrested, a violent mob attacked Jatau's home, seeking to kill her. The attackers burned many houses in Jatau's Christian-majority neighborhood and wounded at least fifteen people.

For sharing the video, Jatau was charged with "inciting public disturbance; exciting contempt of religious creed; and cyber stalking" under Sections 114 and 210 of the Penal Code and Section 24 subsection 1b(i) of the Cybercrime Prohibition Prevention Act of 2015.

Moreover, Bauchi State is one of twelve states in northern Nigeria that have adopted shari'a law. In recent years, an alarming number of Nigerians have been charged with blasphemy-related offenses in these states. Some have been sentenced to death on the basis of shari'a, even though the Nigerian Penal Code only allows for a maximum sentence of two years for "exciting contempt of religious creed."

On November 7, eighteen members of the International Religious Freedom or Belief Alliance (IRFBA) released a joint statement affirming their "firm opposition to blasphemy laws."

The statement noted that "blasphemy laws impede the freedoms of expression and religion or belief in ways inconsistent with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights," and urged governments to "unconditionally release individuals imprisoned" under these laws.

We respectfully urge you to intervene with the Nigerian authorities at the highest levels to secure Rhoda's freedom. We likewise urge you to make it clear to the Nigerian authorities your "firm opposition" to blasphemy laws.

Respectfully yours,
